Planning ahead: Emergency preparedness for caregivers

As we age, we lose the ability to control our body temperature. People living with dementia are more vulnerable to heat stress, resulting in dehydration, heat stroke or heat rashes – but research also shows that symptoms of dementia may worsen due to higher temperatures. Therefore, the likelihood of emergency visits, hospitalization and even death increases during periods of extreme heat.

Coping with extreme heat

Given the rise of more frequent and longer-lasting heatwaves in the future, check in on your family member, friends or neighbours to make sure they're okay. Here are a few quick tips to stay cool:

- Stay in areas with air conditioning, including community centres and shopping malls.
- Stay out of the day and seek shade when you're the heat at the hottest times of outside.
- Set reminders to have a drink.
- Wear lightweight and light-coloured clothing.
- Take cool showers, baths or sponge baths.
- Take note of signs of heat stroke and other heat-related illnesses.

Preparing for emergency and disasters

Emergency situations like wildfires and flooding can have a significant impact on everyone's safety. Many people living with dementia may become distressed when their routine is disturbed and, in some cases, they may have trouble understanding what is happening or feel confused or upset in an unfamiliar place during an evacuation. Planning ahead can alleviate the stress caused by sudden changes and it may help you to respond to situations more quickly.

- Prepare an emergency kit. Include medication, identification and copies of legal documents.
- Stay updated with current news and alerts with trusted media and authorities, including the B.C. emergency alert messages sent to your wireless devices.
- If you know an emergency is about to happen, immediately get yourself and the person living with dementia to a safe place.
- If the need to evacuate is likely, leave as early as possible to avoid heavy traffic.
- Alert family members, friends and health-care providers that the person living with dementia is relocating temporarily and provide contact information.

Overall, remain calm, stay with the person living with dementia and reassure them that everything will be fine.
