

Taking a Break: It's Essential

Why it is important to take a break and strategies on how to arrange it

The demands on your physical and emotional resources will be high if you are a full-time caregiver for a person with dementia. You are a nurse, cook, cleaner, chauffeur, counselor and comforter. You become the person's defender, navigator and advocate, insisting that the needs you can't meet must be met by others. You maybe a caregiver because you have an intimate relationship with the person you are looking after. Usually the bond is love, but not always. The bond may be one of obligation, religion or simply the lack of anyone else to do it. Caregiving responsibilities start off slowly, early in the disease, but can escalate to 24 hours a day, seven days a week, often for years, as the disease progresses.

It is not difficult to realize that caregivers who are providing day-to-day care for a person with dementia are at a high risk for exhaustion, stress and burnout. Research tells us that if you don't look after yourself you are at risk for physical and emotional health problems. It is essential that your caregiving is balanced with taking care of yourself. You need to take breaks from caregiving responsibilities and they need to be scheduled into your weekly caregiving plan.

Taking breaks or arranging respite care, can relieve stress, restore energy, and promote balance in your life. Many caregivers find that a regular break means that they can recharge and avoid burn out. It also gives a person with dementia an opportunity to socialise and meet other people and for them to get used to other people providing support and care.

A break can give you:

- Time to do things that you need to get done such as going to the bank or grocery shopping
- Time for yourself such as going to the theater, reading a book, getting your hair done, going for a walk, or attending an Alzheimer Society support group.

- A chance to get away for a holiday for a weekend, a week, a day, or a few hours.

What would a break mean to you? What would help you recharge or reduce the stress you may be feeling?

There are many resources and options available to you that may help you take a break. Start with your "informal sources". These are your family members, friends and neighbors – people who care about your health and welfare. Many people want to help but don't know how. Make a list of all you'd consider to be part of your 'circle of care'. Once that is done:

- Make a list of things that need done (eg. cutting grass, driving to appointments). Post it on your fridge and have people sign up for a task, or ask them what they would/could do when they drop by.
- Schedule people into the week with specific times and/or activities (eg. take dog for a walk, visit for an hour)

If your circle of care is small or limited consider volunteer companion programs. You may be able to find a volunteer through your local place of worship, community centre or Alzheimer Society.

Formal Resources are also available and they include:

- Community support programs that provide help with laundry, shopping, preparing meals, home maintenance and paid companionship.

- Personal care or home health aide services to provide assistance with personal care such as bathing, dressing, toileting and exercising.
- Adult Day Respite Programs offer a place where the person with dementia can be with others in a safe environment. Planned activities are scheduled throughout the day such as music and art programs. Transportation and meals are often provided.
- Skilled care services to help with medication and other medical services such as occupational therapy.
- Residential facilities may offer a stay overnight, for a few days or a few weeks. Overnight care allows caregivers to take an extended break or vacation while the person with dementia stays in a supervised, safe environment. The cost for these services varies.

* Contact your local Alzheimer Society for information on how to access these services.

Turning a “no” into a “yes”

Occasionally difficulties can arise, particularly when using formal resources for the first time. Some caregivers find that the person with dementia does not wish to have someone in their home that they “do not know” or the person with dementia may be reluctant to leave their home to attend an Adult Day Respite Program. Remember the person may not understand why the help or service is needed.

There are many ways to manage these difficulties so that you and the person you are caring for can make the most of respite care.

- Many families and caregivers have found it useful to start using both informal and formal resources as early as possible so that everyone can get used to sharing dementia care. It is often best to start with small breaks and build up to longer ones.

- You will know best how far in advance to tell the person with dementia about the break. Provide reassurance if they are anxious and make sure that they know that you are positive about the break, even if you’re feeling a little anxious yourself.
- When the time comes, explain the break in a way that may make the best sense to the person. Eg: “Frank enjoys your company; he’s going to stop by today”; “time to volunteer at the seniors’ centre. I know they appreciate your help.”; “We both need a little holiday. It will be good for us.” Be positive in your explanation. Stay calm and give information in a clear and simple manner.
- Remember that it is not selfish to want or need a rest.

For further tips and strategies, refer to the Fact Sheet: “Preparing for in-home help and support” www.alzheimer.ca/ottawa

Why caregivers are reluctant to take a break

Despite the uniqueness of every situation, caregivers have the common experience of constantly putting someone else’s needs ahead of their own. The needs of the person being cared for always seem to come first. Many caregivers deny that they need to take a break or that they need help from others. The reality is that no one can provide care alone for a person with dementia. For further information, take a look at the video: No Thanks, We’re Fine: Supporting Families Living with Dementia

at: www.youtube.com/watch?v=1SPEWhue4Do

Take a break! You will be a better caregiver when you return!

This Fact Sheet is provided courtesy of the Alzheimer Society of Ottawa and Renfrew County

Resources:

- Respite Fact Sheet: www.alzheimers.org.uk
- Respite as an Outcome: www.ccc-ccan.ca
- The ABC Approach to Behaviours, Linda Teri: www.bendigohealth.org.au

Further information on this topic

Visit the following websites:

- www.alzheimer.org.au
- www.alzheimer.ca

(July 2013)