Jeanette Rankin (1880–1973) was the first woman elected to federal office in the United States. The politician, suffragist, and pacifist served as a congressional representative from Montana, the state she grew up in. She served one term, from 1917 to 1919, but after spending the next few decades promoting world peace, equality, child labor protections, and voting rights, she was elected to Congress again in 1940. After her second term, Rankin continued her activism for the remainder of her life. In 1993, her legacy was honored by her induction into the National Women's Hall of Fame.

Travel to Cajun country in Louisiana and you're bound to find boudin, a local sausage made from ground pork, rice, and a mixture of spices. The food has roots with the Acadians, French immigrants who settled in Nova Scotia, which during the 1600s was known as Acadia. Around 1755, the British expelled the French from Acadia after they refused to pledge allegiance to the king of England. Many Acadians ended up in Louisiana. In fact, the word Acadians, or 'Cadians', evolved into the term Cajun. French cooking traditions blended with other local flavors to create Louisiana's famous boudin.
