

Alzheimer Society of Ontario seeks to build a safer Ottawa for people living with dementia

OTTAWA, ON – January 18, 2018 – The Alzheimer Society of Ontario is calling attention to the serious risk of going missing that people living with dementia-related memory problems face – 60 per cent will become lost at some point.

“Half of the people living with dementia who go missing for 24 hours face serious injury or death,” said Lisa Salapatek, Chief Program and Public Policy Officer, Alzheimer Society of Ontario. “It is everyone’s responsibility to keep these people safe. While having dementia presents challenges, there are many things we can do to manage the risk of getting lost or going missing.”

Through Finding Your Way the provincial charity is helping people in Ottawa who are living with dementia, their families and caregivers recognize the risk of going missing, be prepared for incidents of going missing, and ensure that people with dementia can live safely in the community. The program outlines simple, but vital strategies that can help people stay safe while maintaining their quality of life.

One tip suggests that families consider using a tracking device. According to an Ottawa resident, technology can be used to help balance safety and independence.

“While living in a retirement community my mother went missing twice,” said Norman, an Ottawa local whose mother lives with Alzheimer’s. “Both times we were able to quickly locate her using a small GPS tracking device. Using a locating device is a values-based discussion your family needs to have together. In my case, the level of independence my mother was able to maintain far outweighed our concerns.”

“Having a plan to reduce the risk of wandering is critical for people living with dementia and their caregivers,” says Dipika Damerla, Minister of Seniors Affairs. “By raising awareness and using strategies through Finding Your Way, we can proactively keep people safe in their home and community.”
